Excerpt: .may be easily remembered by connecting them with the most peculiar or extraordinary plant which they contain; and the properties of the genera compiling them may likewise be impressed upon the mind in a similar manner, by associating them with the species in which they are most perceptible. Considering the universal, nay instinctive, love of natural order which exists among mankind, it is really astonishing that any attempts should be made to check the progress of a botanical system, of which that is the most remarkable recommendation. What would be thought of a valuable narrative, the events of which were connected only by the similarity of one or two of their features, without any regard to the period of their occurrence, or their relative position towards each other? We may reasonably infer that every person of sense would discard and contemn it; while the individual...
