Miller, Political Chief of the Brazos, and Henry Ruez, chief of the Nacogdoches department, had taken every step in their power to accomplish that object. General Sam Houston had been elected commander of the Nacogdoches department and had issued an inspiring address to the people. Every one, excepting such Tories as James H. C. Miller (who speedily departed to parts unknown), felt a new inspiration under the auspicious signs of the times. Here it is well to pause and ask the impartial reader to review the overwhelming grounds justifying the people in taking these measures of preparation for the defense of their homes and firesides, their wives and children. No free people known to history ever had stronger grounds for resisting oppression. Yet while this is true, it is equally true that men of intelligence and patriotism often differ widely in opinion, drawing dissimilar conclusions from the same combination of facts. A striking illustration of this truth is found just at this time in a letter from T. Jefferson Chambers to John J. Linn of Guadalupe Victoria, dated San Felipe, August 5th, 1835, in which he says: I am informed that you are in a great state of alarm, fearful that the general government meditates an attack upon the colonies. This I regret exceedingly, as I am of opinion that your fears are groundless, and have probably proceeded from misstatements and causeless rumors. I have no doubt of the good...
