The toxins which developed after transplantation were comparable to a spectrum at one end of which were the homoiotoxins and at the other an absence of toxins after autotransplantation, the various lengths of syngensiotoxins forming the center. The behavior of lymphocytes, fibroblasts, and vessels toward the syngensiotoxins represented a reaction on the part of different tissues to the same kind of chemical agency. However, the reaction of the fibroblasts and vessels occurred only when the syngensiotoxins were produced in such a quantity that the effect became apparent within the first twelve days after transplantation, while the reaction of the lymphocytes sometimes became marked at a late date in cases in which at an early period after transplantation the syngensiotoxins were not yet sufficiently strong to call forth the fibroblast and vascular reaction. With certain exceptions which were indicated in this paper, both reactions ran a parallel course. It appeared probable that with the progress of time the syngensiotoxins collected in increasing strength within the transplanted or neighboring tissue and thus brought about the delayed reaction. Preliminary results obtained in multiple syngensio-plastic transplantations indicated that the syngensio- and homoiotoxins were of a complex character and that a further analysis of the syngensiotoxins and homoiotoxins might be accomplished by cross transplantations. From the agreement between the results obtained previously by syngensiotransplantation into the rat and the results of these experiments on the guinea pig it appears probable that the findings have a general...
