Mexico, who have gone thither in search of an establishment, temporary or definitive, and who have there interests of importance. If they are harassed and disturbed, they cannot rely upon their consuls, upon their fellow countrymen, upon their government, without fear of offending the Mexican government. If, on the contrary, they are treated with humanity, they cannot then rejoice at it or speak highly of it without passing for traitors to their country. I know that there are men who give themselves very little concern about these matters. We have the power, say they; our fellow-countrymen will be protected by our valiant army. Gentlemen, let us predicate nothing upon force. Moreover, that never suffices to justify and purify; what it establishes has its vicissitudes and its terrible instabilities. Let us base everything on right, on truth, on reason, on moderation; let us be persuaded that this...
